²⁰ jennet or jennab (جنة) Paradise, heaven. Mahomet knew the genius of his countrymen too well, to suppose that they would be captivated with the idea of mere spiritual enjoyments in the world to come; he therefore declared, that as the body in this life takes so much part in the sufferings of the soul, it should in justice partake of its happiness hereafter, by the most exquisite enjoyment of every corporeal sense. A vulgar notion has prevailed, that the Arabian prophet excludes women from his paradise, but he had too high a regard for the sex to be guilty of so unpolite a piece of injustice: the idea originated from a verse in the Alcoran, which most certainly allows no place there for old women; this gave so much uneasiness to an ancient dame, that she remonstrated to Mahomet upon the cruelty of the exclusion; when the prophet rendered her immediately perfectly happy by declaring that all the old women should be restored to the bloom of youth before they entered those mansions of bliss. The Mahometans believe that there are eight heavens, or different degrees of felicity for the blessed; and seven hells, or degrees of torment, for the damned; drawing from thence an inference, that the mercy of God surpasses his justice.
²¹ abli jennet The inhabitants of paradise.
²² jennet mekan Placed in paradise (a mode of speaking of deceased princes).
²³ jenneti aden The garden of Eden. The Mahometans assign three places for this terrestrial paradise: The first, near Damascus in Syria; the second, towards Obollah in the Ara-

- bian Irac or Chaldea; and the third, on a spot bordering upon the desert of Noubendijan in Persia, called Sheb Bouvan, watered by the Nilab; whilst others fix it at Samarcand. The more ancient traditions however place it in the island of Serendib or Ceylon, where they say Adam was interred; agreeable to which opinion the Portuguese have named the mountain, where they pretend to point out the grotto and sepulchre of the father of mankind, Pico d'Adam.

A leach, a blood-sucker. دیو ابا Possessed by the devil, a demoniac. دیو یار The devil's wind, a whirlwind, hurricane, monsoon. The Dives, genii, or giants, in Eastern mythology, are a race of malignant beings, called likewise Div ner, male demons, (the Peris being imagined of the female sex, though both are supposed to propagate their species independent of one another, an irreconcilable enmity subsisting between them, See پری). The Persians say, that four of the principal genii made war upon Tahmuras, the third king of the Pishadian dynasty, by whom however they were defeated, and imprisoned in frightful caverns; on which account that prince is called in history and romance Diu bend, the chainer of demons. In the Chronicle of Abujasar, there is a tradition, that God created the Genii or Dives long before Adam, and gave them the world to rule over for 7000 years: after which, the sovereignty was vested in the Peris and Dives for 2000 years more, under their sole monarch Gian ben Gian: but these beings disobeying the mandates of God, Eblis (the devil) then an etherial angel, was sent from heaven to chastise and govern them; when, being joined by a considerable party of malecontents, he gave battle to Gian ben Gian, whom he totally routed, and became in his room absolute sovereign of the earth. Intoxicated however with his dignity, Eblis forgot that he was inferior to Omnipotence: to humble him therefore Man was created, and the proud angel commanded to obey him; but refusing, he was cursed by God, and doomed to everlasting torment. From this stubborn disobedience, it is added, he was named Iba, The Refractory; Eblis, The Desperate; and Sheitan, The Proud: his original name having been Hares The Guardian or Protector.

diwar A wall. A species of juniper yielding milk. ساده طایش دیوار A park or garden wall. تخته دیواری A wall of boards, a paling inclosure. دیوار حصار The walls of a city. درو دیوار The gates and walls. دیوار بینی The wall or gristle partition of the nose. دیواسفت (or دیواسپست) A medical flower of a blue colour; also a kind of black grain found amongst wheat; likewise a species of thistle.

diwan A royal court. A tribunal of justice, revenue, &c. A council of state, a senate or divan. The Asiatics say, that Solomon (son of David) had a divan, in which he judged not only men, but likewise the Peris, and Genii, or Demons; over whom he exercised a despotick authority.—The Khalifs of the house of Abbas constituted a divan (called الديوان) which took cognizance of all the acts of tyranny of the great men throughout the empire. The Khalifs themselves for some time presided in it; but in the reign of Moctader (about the beginning of the tenth century) a woman, according to some historians, discharged the office of president. ديوان ایاک دیوان A divan called on any popular tumult, when the sovereign must shew himself at a window to answer and redress the complaints of his subjects. ديوان عرض لشکر A court for military petitions. رأس الديوان The president of the council, the high chancellor. ديوان داشتن To hold a council. ديوان همايون The august or imperial court. ديوان غلبه دیوان A public diet, or general assembly. ديوان خانه The hall of audience. Divan A compleat series of odes or other poems by one author, running through the whole alphabet; the rhymes of the first class terminating in ا, the second in ب, the third in ت, &c. also the collection of the works of one author in prose, as well as verse, especially after he is dead. (See حافظ). Many authors have completed Divans, as Gassani, Saouthi, Zemremi, &c. among the Arabians, and Hafez, Giani, &c. among the Persians. Divan signifies also * An account-book. * A muster-roll, or military pay-book. * A recueil, or miscellaneous collection, from different authors.

Rustam was said to have been a general under Cai Caus (Darius the Mede), and his successor Cai Khosrou (Cyrus); whilst others place him in the reign of Khishasp (Darius Hystaspes). His single combat with Asfendiar, the son of this prince, is highly celebrated in the east: it lasted two days; when finding the Brazen Body of his antagonist had a magic charm against arrows, he killed him with the blow of a mace. Rustam was afterwards drawn into an ambush, and put to death by Bahaman or Ardeshir Dirazdest, son of Asfendiar, called by the Greeks Artaxerxes Longimanus. See Asfendiar, p. 115; and Afrasiab, p. 178. Rustam was one of the twelve champions of Persia, called دوازده رخ. See p. 867.

٨ ramazan (pl. رمضانات ramazanat, or رمضانون ramazanun) pronounced by the Arabians ramadan, The ninth month of the Mahometan year; during which their prophet has enjoined a fast of the most rigorous kind; all good Moslems being interdicted from eating, drinking, and conjugal duty, from the rising of the sun till the appearance of the stars; the sick, the traveller, the soldier in the field, and others, whose situation will not permit so strict an observation of it, being obliged to fast a compleat month when their health and circumstances will allow. The word Ramazan implies a consuming fire; whence it is by some conjectured, that this month was formerly stationary in the most sultry period of the summer, and not revolving through all the seasons, as at present, in consequence of the Mahometan year being universally lunar. The Ramazan is greatly revered on many accounts, but particularly from the belief, that it was on the 27th of this month called ليلة القدر (the night of power) that the Alcoran began to descend from heaven; on the anniversary of which all orthodox Mahometans continue most fervently in prayer, imagining that every petition then put up to Omnipotence will be favourably received. Ramazan is also ١ One of the attributes of God, as the pardoner, and likewise the burner of sinners. ٢ Sand shining, or scorched by the reflection of the sun.

٩ reml ١ Sand, especially a particular kind of it used in Geomancy, called by the Arabians ylm u'preml, The science of the sand. Upon this sand (for which paper is however sometimes substituted) they draw many unequal lines, upon which are disposed a certain number of points; from the combinations of which, they pretend to foretel future events. Some orientals attribute this invention to the Antediluvian patriarch Enoch; (see ادريس); some to the prophet Daniel; some to Cham, the son of Noah; and others to the Egyptian Hermes, or Trismegistus. It is in great credit in the east, many elaborate treatises having been written on the subject. ٢ Making mats, or

^P سال sal (سالیان and سالان, سالها pl.) A year. سال شمسی The solar year. سال قمری (سال در سال or سال بسال) The lunar year. From year to year, every year. سال آینده (سال دیگر) The next year, the year to come. سال قحط A year barren for want of rain.—The epoch of the Persian solar year is of very high antiquity, their historians and astronomers generally carrying it up to Gem or Gemshid (p. 694.) above 800 years before the Christian era. It consists of twelve months, of thirty days each, five days more being added to a particular month to make the number in all 365. For some time there was no embolism, similar to our leap year; in consequence of which, their Nauruz, or new year's day (p. 940.), originally fixed at the vernal equinox when the sun enters Aries, unavoidably made a retrograde progression into Pisces; to remedy which, at the end of every 120 years, a month was intercalated, and celebrated with the greatest festivity all over the kingdom. This month, at the end of the first period, followed Phervardin (March); at the second celebration it was placed after Ardebe- bisht (April); and on the third, it succeeded Khur-dad (May); the five ascititious days being always annexed to it. In this rotation, it continued till the year 636 of the Christian era, when Yezdeghird, III. the last king of the Sassanian dynasty, being defeated and dethroned by the Arabians, Persia became a province of the great empire of the Khalifs; and the Mahometan lunar computation being introduced in all civil and religious affairs, the intercalations of the solar year were, from that period, neglected, till 1079, when the Seljukian sultan of Persia, Malekshah Jellaleddin (Emiru'l Omra (p. 239) to the khalif Moktadi) reformed the kalendar, which has since borne his name; bringing forward the Nauruz from the fifteenth degree of Pisces to the first of Aries, and intercalating an embolismal day every fourth year, which was thence called سال كبيسه or leap-year. The astronomers, in their tables, add the five ascititious days to the last month Isfendarmaz (February); though they are vulgarly annexed to Aban (October), because they happened to follow that month, in the intercalary rotation, at the defeat of Yezdeghird, who had made an alteration in the Kalendar, known by his name, which however, in consequence of that event, soon ceased to be publicly attended to. It may here be observed, that the old Persian month was not divided into weeks, every day having a distinct name taken from the angel supposed to preside over it. See ماه

^P Sikender ^{سکندر} Alexander. Two princes of this name are much celebrated in the East, (both distinguished by the title of زو القرنین Having two horns (of the world), implying that they conquered the globe from east to west; the first supposed to be one of their most ancient kings (see سیر الذهب); the other Alexander of Macedon, whom they call also Ben Filicos (son of Philip), and Roumi (the Grecian). Some Persian historians say, however, that he was not the son of Philip, but of Darab (Darius), who having married a daughter of Philip, sent her back, tho' pregnant, because he disliked her breath; that being delivered of Alexander at her father's court, Philip educated him as his son, and bequeathing him his crown with the secret of his birth, he laid claim to the throne of Persia, then filled by his younger brother Darius (by another mother), and supporting his pretensions with a powerful army, defeated him, and reigned as the tenth king of the Caianian dynasty; dividing his empire on his death-bed amongst twenty-four of his principal commanders, the chief of whom they call Lagos (Ptolemy). The Tarikh Montekheb relates, however, that he distributed his dominions in his life-time among the sons of those princes whom he had conquered, on the condition of their paying him homage as lord paramount, and furnishing certain quotas of troops; which terms they punctually complied with till his death, when each became independent in his feudal principality. (If there are circumstances in these Eastern details inconsistent with truth, let it be remembered, that they are not more visionary than the legendary improbable fictions, which swell the Greek historians). The conquests of Alexander are celebrated in many Persian, Arabick, and Turkish histories, romances and poems, under the titles of Sikender name (the Book of Alexander), Aineh Iskenderi (the mirror of Alexander), Beharistan (the mansion of the Spring), &c.

fikke zeden ^{سکه زن} To coin. سکه زن fikke zen A coiner, the master of the mint. سکه روپیه fikke rupee ficca rupee, of full standard weight.—There is a degree of magnificence in some of the Eastern coins, together with an elegance of fancy in the inscriptions, to which the Europeans have nothing similar. A mere accident having afforded me an opportunity some time ago of making a hasty transcript of one (struck at Delhi, A. D. 1653, in the reign of the Great Mogul Shah Jehan), which to me appeared to give weight to the above observation, I shall here insert a description of it, as it may to some perhaps be an object both of curiosity and information: It is of gold and circular, above 70 ounces in weight, nearly four inches diameter, and four lines thick; in value about 300l. Within the circle on each side is inscribed a square, (the angles in contact with the periphery) in which, and in the complementary segments, are the following inscriptions.

(1. Within the square on one side)

شهاب الدین محمد صاحب قران ثانی شاه جهان پادشاه غازی

The bright star of religion, Mohammud, a second Saheb Keran, Shah Jehan, the victorious emperor. (Saheb Keran is a royal title, similar to Cesar, Augustus, &c. It was adopted by Tamerlane).

(2. In the segment of the circle, on the upper side of the square)

سکه بر مهر دو صد مہری زد از لطف الہ
The impression upon this coin, of 200 mohurs, (see مهر) was struck by divine favour,

(3. On the lateral segment to the left hand)

ثانی صاحب قران شاه جهان دین پناه
by the second Saheb Keran, Shah Jehan, the defender of the faith.

(4. On the bottom segment)

روی زرباد از نقش سکه اش عالم فروز
May the face of gold, from the sculpture of this coin, enlighten the world,

(5. On the lateral segment to the right)

تا شوک از پرتو خورشید روشن روی ماه
as the splendid face of the moon is (illuminated) by the rays of the sun.

On the Exergue or Reverse.

(1. Within the square)

لا الہ الا اللہ محمد رسول اللہ—ضرب ۱۰۶۴
دار الخلافہ شام جهان آباد
There is no God, but God, and Mahomet is the prophet of God. Struck in the palace of Shah-Jehanabad (Delhi) A. H. 1064 (A. D. 1653.)

(2. On the top of the square)

شد ایمان از صدق ابی بکر انور
Religion was enlightened by the truth of Abubekre;

(3. On the left hand compartment)

شد از عدل عمر اسلام قوی دست
The faith was strengthened by the justice of Omar;

(4. On the bottom compartment)

از شرم و حیای عثمان دین تازه شد
Piety was refreshed by the mildness and modesty of Othman;

(5. On the right hand compartment).

ولایت انور در علم علی یافت

——No name is more famous in the east than Solomon: he succeeded his father David, according to their belief, when only twelve years old; at which age, however, Omnipotence placed under his obedience not only mankind, and animals, but even the elements, and the Genii, good and bad. His throne was magnificent beyond idea, 12000 seats of gold being arranged on the right for the patriarchs and prophets, and 12000 on the left for men learned in every science. The birds were his constant attendants, screening him like a canopy from the inclemencies of the weather; whilst the zephyrs, wafting him wherever he wished to go, rendered horses or any earthly carriage unnecessary.——All the wonderful traditions however relative to Solomon, it must be observed, are not confined to the son of David. The heroic or fabulous ages of the Persians go far beyond those of the Europeans; the world, agreeably to their system, being peopled thousands of years before Adam, by ethereal or igneous beings, governed, by a succession of seventy-two Solomons. The supernatural powers supposed to be vested in those Antedemite monarchs, as well as in the king of Judah, are figured to have been chiefly derived from the curious talismans they were said to have possessed, (to which allusions are often made not only in their poems and romances, but even in their graver works, and in the Alcoran itself) as the Khatym, or Mubur Solimani, the seal of Solomon; the Tigh atesh, or the flaming sword; the Jebeh, or the impenetrable cuirass; and the Seper or the shield; which last they add was bequeathed by Jan ben Jan, one of the Antedemite kings, to the father of mankind, who carried it to Serendib (Ceylon), where it was many ages afterwards discovered by Caiumaras, the first king of Persia; from whom descending to his grandson Thahmuras, it was by that prince employed so successfully in his wars with the Dives, that he got the surname of Div bend, or chainer of demons. See دامبال — جان بن جان — ديو — پري &c. These, it may be said, are Persian tales; but let us not ridicule them; they are dignified by the Homer of Persia, Ferdusi, in his Solomon name, as the mythology of the ancients was rendered important by the Homer of Greece. Every age and every nation have their fooleries; many received opinions even of modern times will not bear the touchstone of truth; and the forcery laws of our own country are a far more authentick disgrace to human nature than all the wild yet pleasing fictions of the east.

♂ seba or suba 'The zephyr, a gentle gale; a refreshing wind (generally blowing from the east at the equinox). 'Youth, youthful ardor or love.

♂ Sebaa 'Rising (a star). 'Coming forth (a tooth, nail, &c.) 'Watching the motions or rushing upon (an enemy). 'Changing one's religion, i. e. apostatizing from Mahometism, and becoming a Sabeian. This is one of the most ancient religions we have any traces of, being supposed to be that which prevailed in Persia, previous to the reign of Kishtasp (Darius Hystapes); when it gave way to that of the Magi, then introduced by Zerdust or Zoroaster. (See مع).

They believed in one God, and in the ministry of angels, or inferior deities, as represented by the stars, which became in consequence high objects of their adoration. They held many tenets in common with the Mahometan, the Magian, the Jewish, and even the Christian religion, being by travellers called Christians of St. John, because they adopted a species of baptism. Their chief pilgrimages were to Haran in Mesopotamia, to Mecca, and to the pyramids of Egypt, which they supposed to be the tombs of Seth, and his sons Enoch and Sabi, whom they considered as the founders of their faith. This was the principal religion of the Arabians before Moslemism, and is one of those tolerated by the Alcoran on paying a certain tribute to the prophet and his successors.

 * صفاهان Saḡahan or Isfahan The metropolis of Gebel or Persian Irak (the ancient Parthia). It is said to have been founded above 800 years before the Christian era, and derives its name, as supposed, from Isfahan or Sepahan (cavalry), that being the principal station for the Persian armies, which, in all times, have consisted chiefly of horse. It was before the reign of Cyrus the capital of the Persian empire; but Persepolis, Susa, Madain (Ctesiphon), and other cities having afterwards alternately shared that honour, it was not restored to its former dignity till the eleventh century of the Christian era, under the Seljukian dynasty. On the fall of that family, however, the dynasty of Mozafferians (conquerors) attached themselves to Shiraz, which continued to be the seat of government till the elevation of the Sefi family in the sixteenth century, by whom, but particularly by Shah Abbas the Great (or the Cruel) Isfahan was rendered the most extensive and most magnificent city of Asia; since which period it has continued to be the favourite residence of the Persian monarchs. صفاهاني saḡahani (or پرده صفاهاني) A species of melody, peculiar to Isfahan, much admired in Persia, of a simple pathetic style, and in some degree resembling the Scottish musick.

a dynasty of Persian kings (who reigned from about the year 1500 till the usurpation of Nadir Shah in 1736) so named from Ismael Sefi, the first monarch of this house. The origin of the elevation of this family however must be traced to a private ancestor of that prince, called Sefie'd'din (the purity of religion), who was cotemporary with Tamerlane. He resided at Ardebil, in Media; where his reputation for virtue was so high, that he was visited by that conqueror, as Diogenes was formerly by Alexander. Tamerlane on this occasion was so charmed with his conversation, that desiring him to ask any thing in his power to grant, the sage pointed to a number of young Carmanian captives, (whom this scourge of mankind according to custom meant to sacrifice) on the first publick festivity, and requested their liberty: they were immediately delivered to him as slaves; but the generous philosopher furnishing them with every thing necessary, sent them free to their native country. As they were of the first families in Carmania, their sense of his benevolence found no bounds; they were constant in their attentions, and magnificient in their gifts; a respect little short of adoration was paid to him; and it was chiefly owing at length to the attachment and courage of the descendants of those grateful Carmanians that his posterity mounted the Persian throne.

7 D

first in a quick, the four last in a grave ordinary pace; it being also necessary, every time they pass the black stone (which is set in silver at the south-east corner, about seven spans above the ground) either to kiss or touch it with the hand, which they immediately apply to their lips.

It is supposed by the Mahometans to have been one of the stones of paradise, and that it fell to the earth with Adam; but being again taken up at the deluge, it remained there till the angel Ga-brief brought it to Abraham when he was building the Kaaba. It is said to have the property of swimming in water, and that it was originally as white as snow; tho' it has long since become superficially black, either in consequence of the touch of a menstruous woman, according to some doctors, or, as others imagine, by the kisses of the numberless pilgrims that have in all times flocked to Mecca.

^p Feridun The name of an ancient and celebrated king of Persia, the commencement of whose reign is placed about 750 years before the Christian era. His father (or grandfather) Gemshid, having been driven from his throne by an usurper, named Zohak, the people, after groaning under the oppression of this tyrant for several years, flew at length to arms, under the conduct of a blacksmith of Isfahan, named Gao, who, marching at the head of the insurgents, with his apron displayed as a banner from the point of a spear, gave battle to Zohak, defeated and put him to death. After this important victory, Gao dis-vering the retreat of the young Feridun, placed him on the throne; in return for which, that prince gave him, as a feudal principality, Isfahan, with the surrounding districts (known afterwards by the name of Parthia, now Persian Irak). The blacksmith's apron became from that period the great standard of Persia being from him named Direfsh Gavani, (the banner of Gao). By Feridun and succeeding princes; it was richly ornamented with jewels, and lodged in the royal treasury; whence it was never carried to the field but when the king marched in person. It is said to have fallen at length into the hands of the Arabians, who found it amongst the other spoils of Yezdegird, the last king of the Sassanian dynasty, who was defeated by Saad, general to the khalif Omar in the year 636 of our era. See سال—Feridun is the boast of the Persians, as a model of every virtue; but his reign is so much disguised by fable, that, without placing confidence in the facts, we must only consider them as objects of popular belief. Khondemir, an historian of character, and the Tarikh Cazideh, gravely give him a reign of above five hundred years, which alone justly renders much of the rest suspected. The same length of reign is assigned to this prince, in a book of Persian Cosmogony called Bobun Debesb, written in the Peblevi or old Persick, and asserted, by the Parfis of Guzerat, to be one of the works of Zoroastre; tho' part of it, at least, from allusions to particular events, must have been written since the seventh century of our era. Zoroastre is said to be one of his descendants.

أ قاف Kaf A fabulous mountain, anciently imagined by the Asiatics to surround the world, and to bound the horizon on all sides. In their writings, therefore, to paint the rising of the sun, they say, "When the star of day appeared from the height of Kaf the world was enlightened:" whilst they express the whole extent of the earth, by, "از قاف تا قاف From Kaf to Kaf." To account for the first or false twilight (called الفجر الكاذب), which is followed by an intenser darkness immediately before dawn (named الفجر الصادق or الفجر الثاني true crepuscle), the Eastern astronomers supposed a window in Kaf, some degrees below the summit, thro which the sun's rays being conveyed as he rose, the world after he had passed was left in temporary obscurity till he appeared again above the horizon. Since, however, some of their philosophers have applied themselves to the study of geography, they have discovered Kaf to be Mount Caucasus, or Imaus, to the east, and Mount Atlas, to the west; over which the sun, in those countries, appears to pass when he rises and sets. In the Alcoran (for even Mahomet was carried along by this popular belief) Kaf is said to rest upon a stone, called Sakbrat, formed, according to some learned doctors, of one entire emerald, the reflection from which, they say, gives the azure appearance to the sky; whilst its movements produce earthquakes, volcanoes, and all the extraordinary phenomena of nature. On Kaf the Eastern poets and romances have fixed the residence of the Dives or Genii, (supposing them to have been here confined by Tahmuras, and other ancient heroes of Persia): here too, they say, lies Fairy land; and here they place the city of Aherman (the principle of evil), where Argenk, a Genie king, they add, built a splendid palace; in a gallery of which, were portraits of the different kinds of rational beings who inhabited the globe before Adam. See سليمان — اهرمان — عنقه — ركايل بن ادم — پري — ديو

See امان کاغدی or دین کاغدی—قبار A safe conduct.—The Eastern nations are very curious in their paper, both in their books and in their letters; the most scrupulous etiquette being observed, when addressing great men, to send them precisely that sort of paper which custom has annexed to their rank. To the king, the ground upon which they write is gold; to subahs, and feudatory princes, it is generally ornamented with flowers of gold and other decorations; descending thus, through inferior ranks, with a variety of gradations, both in quality and size, till it becomes either quite plain, or is powdered slightly with gold dust. A great man may be flattered by sending him a paper superior to his dignity; but to err in the other extreme, is considered as an insult which he will not easily forgive. Kaghyz implies likewise a patent, presented by the kings of Persia to those whom they mean to honour; by virtue of which, the governors of every district, thro' which a Kaghyzdar travels, must supply him, the moment he presents it, with carriages and every necessary, to which his rank is intitled.

* گاو or گاه Gao The famous blacksmith

of Isfahan who defeated the usurper Zohak (see فریدون).

The Caherman namé assigns the following fabulous origin of this insurrection. The devil had long been subservient to Zohak, and at last, as a reward for all his services, desired only to kiss his shoulders; when immediately two serpents fastened on the spots where the demon had fixed his lips, and fed incessantly upon his flesh;

the devil then told him, that the only alleviation

of torment he could find would be the application

every day of the brains of two men to the afflicted parts. The gaols were in consequence soon emptied, and the innocent then as well as guilty were

daily dragged to death; till the sons of Gao having at length fallen victims to the tyrant's disease,

the blacksmith flew to arms, and, seconded by the universal voice and power of the people, attacked

and destroyed him. Khondemir, without taking notice of the devil, confirms the tale; and adds, that the gaolers, moved with compassion for their unhappy prisoners thus doomed to feed the tyrant's distemper, allowed many to escape, supplying the demand with the brains of sheep; and that from those fugitives, who took refuge in the Ararat or

Gordian mountains of Armenia, sprung the nation known since by the name of Kurds. The great

Cyrus, he adds, was a lineal descendant of Gao.
